Historical Context

Emili Godes Hurtado's birth in 1895 came at a time when Barcelona was undergoing significant industrial expansion, becoming a center of commerce and culture. His parents, Artur and Emilia, were part of a growing middle class benefiting from the economic opportunities of the era. The city itself was still feeling the effects of its transformation showcased during the 1888 Barcelona Universal Exposition, which had promoted modernization and urban development.

When Emili married Antònia Diago Almuzara in 1920, Europe was recovering from World War I, although Spain remained neutral throughout the conflict. The post-war period saw social and political changes across Europe, including women's suffrage movements gaining momentum; however, Spain was experiencing internal strife that would eventually lead to the dictatorship of Miguel Primo de Rivera in 1923.

Emili's career as a photographer coincided with the flourishing of art and culture known as Modernisme in Catalonia, which was part of a broader Art Nouveau movement in Europe. Photography was becoming an increasingly important medium for artistic expression and documentation. Additionally, his musical education reflects the rich cultural life of early 20th-century Barcelona, where opera and classical music thrived.

The various residences of Emili in Barcelona reflect the city's growth and the mobility of its citizens during this period. The early 20th century saw Barcelona expanding beyond its medieval walls, with new neighborhoods emerging to accommodate the burgeoning population. This urban expansion continued despite challenges such as the Spanish Flu pandemic of 1918-1919 and the social unrest leading up to the Spanish Civil War (1936-1939).

By the time of Emili's death in 1970, Barcelona had undergone dramatic changes. After enduring the hardships of the Spanish Civil War and the subsequent Francoist dictatorship, Spain was on the cusp of transition towards democracy. The late 1960s also witnessed global movements for civil rights and freedoms, echoes of which were felt even under the authoritarian regime in Spain.

Last Name Origins

The surname 'Godes' does not have a widely recognized or documented origin in historical or onomastic sources. It may be a variant of other surnames, possibly derived from personal names or geographical locations, but without specific information, it is challenging to provide an accurate origin for the name 'Godes'. Further research into genealogical records, historical documents, and regional naming patterns might shed light on its provenance.

The surname 'Hurtado' has Spanish origins and is considered a patronymic surname, which means it derives from the first name of a father or ancestor. In this case, 'Hurtado' likely comes from the medieval personal name 'Furtado', itself believed to be taken from the word 'fuerte', meaning 'strong' in Spanish. The 'h' was added later, perhaps as a form of distinction or due to linguistic evolution. This surname would have been given to the descendants of someone who bore the characteristics implied by the name 'Furtado', such as strength or fortitude.

Consistency Issues

1. The number of children is inconsistent between sources; source ^[1] mentions three children while source ^[2] only mentions two.
2. Antònia Diago Almuzara's birth date is listed as February 26, 1900, in source ^[1] but as February 27, 1900, in source ^[2].
3. The sibling named 'Mercé' appears only in source ^[2]; it may be an alternative name or nickname for one of the siblings mentioned in source ^[1].
4. Emili's age at death is given as 74 years old in source ^[1] and ^[2], but source ^[3] suggests he was 75 years old.
