Historical Context

Mercedes Godes Hurtado was born into the early 20th century in Barcelona, a period marked by political unrest and cultural vibrancy in Spain. Her birth year of 1901 came just after the loss of Spain's last colonies in the Spanish-American War (1898), which had triggered a national identity crisis. The family's residence in Barcelona placed them at the heart of Catalan modernism and industrial expansion, with the city being a hub for artists, architects like Antoni Gaudí, and intellectuals.

The various residences of Mercedes in Barcelona coincided with significant historical events. During her moves within the city from 1901 to 1935, Spain experienced the establishment of the Second Republic in 1931, which brought hopes of social reform and autonomy for regions like Catalonia. However, this period also led to the outbreak of the Spanish Civil War in 1936, a conflict that would deeply affect Barcelona through bombings and political strife. Following the war, Francisco Franco's dictatorship began, leading to repression of Catalan culture and language, which likely impacted Mercedes' life directly.

Mercedes passed away in 1993, having lived through the entirety of Franco's regime, which ended with his death in 1975. She witnessed Spain's transition to democracy, the reinstatement of the Generalitat de Catalunya (Catalonia's government), and the hosting of the Olympic Games in Barcelona in 1992, symbolizing the city's resurgence on the world stage. Her burial in Cementiri de les Corts occurred as Spain was fully integrated into the European community, marking a stark contrast from the isolation it faced during much of her lifetime.

Last Name Origins

The surname 'Godes' does not have a widely recognized or documented origin in historical or onomastic literature. It may be of patronymic, toponymic, or occupational origin depending on the cultural and linguistic context in which it arose. Without specific information about the family history or geographic origins, it is challenging to provide an accurate origin for this surname.

The surname 'Hurtado' has its origins in Spain. It is derived from the Spanish word 'hurtar', meaning 'to steal'. The name was likely originally given as a nickname to someone who was stealthy or light-fingered. Over time, such nicknames became hereditary, evolving into surnames. In the context of medieval Spain, where surnames began to become fixed, 'Hurtado' would have been passed down through generations, losing its original connotation and simply becoming a family identifier.
